

LIVING COURAGEOUSLY

Christians have every reason to live courageously. After all, the final battle has already been won on the cross at Calvary. But even dedicated followers of Christ may find their courage tested by the inevitable disappointments and fears that visit the lives of believers and non-believers alike. Courage is not the absence of fear, but rather the judgment that something else is more important than fear...trust.

When you find yourself worried about the challenges of today or the uncertainties of tomorrow, you must ask yourself whether or not you are ready to place your concerns and your life in God's all-powerful, all-knowing, all-loving hands. If the answer to that question is yes--as it should be--then you can draw courage today from the source of strength that never fails you: your Heavenly Father.
